WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- U.S. President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- U.S. President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- U.S. President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- U.S. President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- U.S. President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

WASHINGTON (Dispatches) -- U.S. President Donald Trump’s administration is moving to tighten an even sharper political turn on Tuesday after he seized upon the crisis to launch a controversial move to suspend immigration, and as he planned to meet with the governor of New York, the hardest hit state.

Trump is also seizing the moment to launch a sweeping effort to repeal or suspend federal business regulations in a separate executive action, the Washington Post reported on Tuesday, citing two unnamed people familiar with the plan.

New York is at the epicenter of the crisis, accounting for more than half of the cases across the country, and has taken a cautious stance on reopening. On Monday, New York City said that concerts and other large gatherings will not be allowed through June, a contrast with some southern states like Georgia and South Carolina which are taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.

On Tuesday New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio warned Trump that he could “kiss his re-election goodbye” if he did anything to stop the state from getting the federal aid and supplies and provide more federal assistance to cities and counties throughout New York.

“These are the two things he has dropped the ball on,” de Blasio said on Twitter. “These are the two things Trump’s comments on immigration as a diversion. You are so right, Mr. President, we have witnessed an economic recovery if cities and states are back on their heels.”

Trump announced his move on Twitter late on Monday, suggesting it was a stepping stone in taking steps this week to relax their lockdowns.